

U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

written by Lauri Moon | November 22, 2022

The US is experiencing trade growth and regulatory changes regarding international exports, imports, trade agreements, security, and contracts. One critical element of global trade compliance is understanding and complying with regulations related to transaction with Foreign Governments and Foreign Government Owned Entities.

The US is one of several countries that has regulations on legal and ethical practices that companies must follow when dealing with Foreign Governments. These regulations can differ significantly from normal business practices you may follow when selling or entering into an agreement in the global marketplace. Not understanding and adhering to these regulations can have costly consequences, even if the Foreign Government Entity “looks the other way” you can still be subject to penalties and even prosecution here in the US.
